SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

Background

TSO-C122 provides standards for equipment designed to prevent blocked channels in two-way radio communications caused by simultaneous transmissions. Originally issued in April 1994, the current revision, TSO-C122a, was issued on August 26, 2005.

On June 18, 2012, the FAA issued a Notice of Intent to Cancel TSO-C122a (77 FR 37734), citing that only one manufacturer has been issued a letter of TSO design approval since the original issuance of TSO-C122 in 1994. The FAA also cited “the eventual obsolescence of TSO-C122a equipment.”

The FAA received no public comments in response to TSO-C122a and has not granted any new authorizations or letter of TSO design approvals since the notice was published. As a result, the FAA has not finalized the cancellation of the TSO. TSO-C122a remains active, and manufacturers may continue to use TSO-C122a when designing and producing equipment for TSO authorization or letters of TSO design approval.

Recent Safety Investigation

The National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) in 2025 investigated a midair collision. According to the NTSB’s investigation preliminary report, the flightcrew of an aircraft involved in a midair collision may not have received a critical air traffic control instruction shortly before the collision due to simultaneous radio transmissions.

TSO-C122a equipment is designed to prevent blocked communications caused by simultaneous transmissions. As a result, this TSO-C122a equipment could reduce the risk of similar incidents in the future.

FAA Action

In light of the NTSB’s findings, the FAA is withdrawing its prior intent to cancel TSO-C122a and is also reopening the associated comment period.

RTCA Special Committee 226, Audio Systems and Equipment, which was referenced in TSO-C122a, dated June 18, 2012, is no longer active. When the committee was active, the FAA intended to “continue to coordinate . . . for any new developments on other means being used to address blocked channels caused by simultaneous transmissions.” The FAA now invites stakeholder input on current technical standards or operational practices that serve a similar function.

Request for Comments

The FAA seeks further public comments on the technical implementation and operational considerations related to TSO-C122a. Given that TSO-C122a, dated June 18, 2012, cited “the eventual obsolescence of TSO-C122a equipment” as part of the rationale for the original intent to withdraw the TSO, the FAA specifically invites comments on whether TSO-C122a and the standard it references, RTCA/DO-209 (“Minimum Operational Performance Standards For Devices That Prevent Blocked Channels Used In Two-Way Radio Communications Due To Simultaneous Transmissions,” dated April 23, 1992), are obsolete or obsolescent. If so, the FAA welcomes input to identify current technologies that may have replaced them.

Issued in Kansas City, Missouri, on July 9, 2025.
